INTERESTING CULLINGS.

Literature has amusing stories of ceasants and workingmen who, sudpeasants and workingmen who, sud-denly raised to wealth and position, imagined themselves mad or dream-ing. Doubtless their feelings under such circumstances might resemble those of Bottom, the weaver, when he found himself beloved by Titania, the fairy queen. There are persons, how-ever, who can bear off unaccustomed honors with credit to themselves and their new position.

their new position. On the accession of the present Manchu dynasty in China, in 1644, the heir of the last Ming emperor was made a marquis. During the reign of the last emperor but one, the holder of the marquisate died without sons, and reference was at once made to the family records to ascertain who was the next heir. It was found that he was an obscure person, who had been entirely lost sight of by his family, and for a long time it was impossible to trace his whereabouts. Finally, however, he was discovered selling pumpkins outside the gates of Pekin, and was with difficulty convinced that he had become heir to a large fortune and a title. He was a rustic in manners. and quite destitute of education, though an honest man, who had al-ways done his best to support himself and his family without incurring debt. The officials by whom he was discovered at once hurried him away, washed, shaved and combed him, and exchanged his rags for costly raiment. For several days they devoted them-selves to polishing his manners, and teaching him the phrases needful for a presentation at court, and he was then brought before the emperor as the new Ming marquis. "Stupidity" was admitted in one of the built have courts as an extenuating circumstrate and of bigamy. The greater part of the year he was absent from home, like many Politich workware working also where In ish workmen, working elsewhere. In the winter when he was at home, his better half mingled with her caresses bitter reproaches because he did not earn so much as his comrades. As this kind of welcome repeated itself every year, the little reason that he is now indeed to judged to possess suggested to him that it was more prudent to quit his that it was more prudent to quit his home forever. He came to Berlin, and here also his want of common sense made him yield to the temptation to get married again. When the moned before the court the judge duly explained to him the enermity of the crime of bigamy, remaining him that we were not living in Turkey. His legal and geographical knowledge could not bring the matter home to him, and he excused himself on the ground that, as he had not seen his wife for four years, he did not consider there was any harm in marrying a second time. The public prosecutor asked that the defendant should be sentenced to two years' imprisonment with hard labor, but the judge wisely took a lenient view of the case, anof the prisoner was an extenuating circumstance, and therefore he would only sentence him to imprisonment for one year and a half.—London Tele-

He placed the ice in a tub of water and when he returned home a few hours later the block had melted and he was astonished to find the fish, which had been in its key grasp for several months, swimming about it the tub. The trout measures thirties inches in length, and, though slights emaciated, is not otherwise the work
